Australian researchers have demonstrated, for the first time, that widely used painkillers commonly given to cancer patients can block production of gonadotropin releasing hormone (GnRH), which stimulates the release of sex hormones from the pituitary gland, and thereby reduce a female's sex drive, causing reduced fertility. The team, from The University of Melbourne, showed in mice that treatment with specific anticancer drugs called taxanes triggered a vicious cycle of inflammation and pain, and that the cycle induced marked changes in the level of GnRH within the brains of the mice. GnRH is a hormone essential for ovulation and fertilization. The study is an example of the many aspects of cancer treatment, which can affect the body's systems, causing troublesome side effects. "However, we hope that future studies will enable us to see whether the same cycle occurs in humans, and if so, if we can block it," said co-author Associate Professor Christos Lionis. The scientists examined the brain tissue of mice receiving different doses of paclitaxel, which was given either as a single dose or on two different days. The study compared the treatment to mice receiving only one dose of vehicle, and mice receiving no treatment. The team of scientists found that the animals who received the paclitaxel were subject to higher levels of inflammation in the cells of the immune system in the brain. They also found there was much higher expression of GnRH in the brain. The GnRH found in the
