We have a legacy codebase that we want to use a docker image to build. We have three departments working on this code and each want their own docker container to be built. We are thinking of using separate docker containers for each. Is it possible to have containers from different teams work on the same image? A: It depends on how you build the image. If you build the docker image on a tool like Docker Hub, it will require you to create a dedicated image for each build. So, yes, you can build a single docker image, and use that image with different applications. If you build the image from scratch, then you're free to do whatever you like, and you'll have to make sure each department uses the same base image. Alternatively, if you build the image from another image, then it'll be possible for all departments to use the same base image, but you'll have to make sure that all building processes are identical. In short, there's no way to make all departments build their own image, but it's entirely possible to make all departments build images from the same repository.
