Use the Sidebar on the next few pages to find out more about Photoshop. Making layer masks A layer mask is a rectangular-shaped transparent "stencil" that you place over a layer. You can change the transparency of a layer mask so that you can see through it. You can also combine multiple layer masks to create complex masking effects. You can draw a mask in any shape you want. The size of the mask doesn't matter (unless you use the exact same size that the layer you mask is using, which would cause some problems for the rest of the image). Here are the steps for creating a layer mask: 1. Create the image that you want to mask. 2. Select the layer you want to mask and press Ctrl+Alt+Shift+U to create a new selection that includes only the layer. 3. Choose Layer⇒Create Layer Mask⇒Create Layer Mask. 4. Paint with black or another color to mask the layer. You can use any color or shade of color for the layer mask, but the main thing to remember is to use a color that is 100 percent transparent. 5. Place the mask using the Move tool, as shown on the right in Figure 11-3. Photoshop places the mask over the layer. If you wish, you can move the mask by using the arrow keys or the grid lines. You can also select a portion of the mask (the currently selected area is shown highlighted in the figure) and click the Move tool to move a portion of the mask. Figure 11-3: Use the Move tool to place a selection of a layer mask. When you're satisfied with the mask, choose Layer⇒Create Layer Mask⇒Hide Mask to hide the layer mask. Creating grayscale images Grayscale images are a great way to add a bit of texture to your photos, but sometimes they can be difficult to produce and manage. These images are created by giving each color in the image a different grayscale value, meaning that the reds are grayed out, the blues are grayed out, and so on. To create a grayscale image, follow these steps: 1. Create a new black and white file using the File⇒New command. 2. Choose File⇒Mode⇒Grayscale and then

Comorbidity with depression in hospitalized pediatric patients. Depressive disorders are the fourth leading cause of disease burden globally. Pediatric populations are highly vulnerable to depression, with even more at risk for comorbidity with other disorders. This is a retrospective chart review of hospitalized patients for depression in an ambulatory-care based service. Of the 9750 patients, 4.3% had a documented depression history, and 8.6% were diagnosed with a current depressive episode. Forty-eight percent of depressed patients had a comorbid diagnosis. Concurrent psychiatric diagnoses included attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (4.9%), anxiety (4.6%), bipolar disorder (3.6%), and post-traumatic stress (2.2%). Comorbidity with other disruptive behavioral disorders included oppositional defiant disorder (0.9%), conduct disorder (2.2%), and intermittent explosive disorder (1.1%). Concomitant anxiety disorders included separation anxiety disorder (0.8%), selective mutism (0.6%), social anxiety (0.4%), and obsessive compulsive disorder (0.4%). Non-compulsive disorders included specific phobia (0.9%), somatic symptom disorder (0.9%), generalized anxiety (0.7%), and tic disorder (0.3%). Depression is common in pediatric patients and is often associated with other disorders. Depression can frequently be overlooked in pediatric patients. Non-invasive and non-irradiation detection of early vascular endothelial dysfunction in experimental migraine. The vasomotor response is impaired during migraine attack, but the mechanisms leading to its induction remain unknown. Here, we have examined the response to acetylcholine (Ach) and sodium nitroprusside (SNP) on the temporal relationship between cortical spreading depression (CSD) and the vasomotor response in rat. The trigeminal nitrergic and endothelinergic (ET) responses to Ach and SNP were evaluated in the intact and cut dura matter with and without CSD. The nitrergic response to Ach was impaired, whereas the nitrergic response to SNP was intact during CSD. The ET-1 response to Ach was reduced during CSD. The ET-1 response to SNP was never impaired during CSD. In view of the lack of inhibition of the ET-1 response during CSD, these data suggest an increased nitrergic activity. A possible prejunctional modulation of the nitrergic pathway by ET

Towards better site-directed mutagenesis. Improved site-directed mutagenesis techniques that overcome the limitations of mutagenesis as a whole should reduce the time and effort involved in isolating mutants. In addition, the increased ease and reliability with which mutants can be made may lead to a reduction in some of the factors that limit the conduct of research. In this paper we review some techniques that have been developed with the aim of reducing the limitations of standard methods of site-directed mutagenesis. We concentrate on the techniques that rely upon oligonucleotide site-directed mutagenesis and identify two main areas in which improvements can be made. Firstly, the existing methods of site-directed mutagenesis can be seen as a two-step process with quality control in between. Improving the quality control techniques in oligonucleotide mutagenesis should lead to a reduction in the proportion of mutated clones that express a phenotypic change. This has a direct bearing on the costs associated with the preparation of mutants. Secondly, the protocols that exist for the rapid identification of mutants can be used as a two-step strategy in which the first step involves the screening of mutants for their response to the phenotypic marker and the second step involves screening the colonies expressing the phenotype against the phenotypic marker used to select for the mutant. This approach saves time and money and could even reduce the number of mutants prepared if screening for the phenotype revealed a higher number of mutants expressing the phenotype than were reported by the screen for the existence of the phenotype. We propose that improvements in these two areas, in conjunction with the development of more sensitive phenotypic markers, will significantly improve the rapid preparation of mutants in both eukaryotic and prokaryotic organisms. We also discuss how improvements in the field may have a bearing on the future of site-directed mutagenesis. Diagnostic performance of ultrasound-guided core needle biopsy of peripheral lymph nodes in patients with breast cancer: a comparative study with fine-needle aspiration biopsy. The purpose of this study was to assess the diagnostic performance of ultrasound-guided core needle biopsy (USCN) of lymph nodes in patients with breast cancer and compare it with that of fine-needle aspiration biopsy (FNAB). One hundred patients with breast cancer who underwent US-guided CNB were selected. The diagnosis of malignancy was confirmed with subsequent histopathology. We compared the results of CNB with those of FNAB. The diagnostic
