Key points: State of emergency in place for at least 72 hours Moves to restrict the movement of people to minimise virus spread Man arrested after breaking quarantine rules All non-essential visitors to the territory will be stopped at the Darwin International Airport from 2pm today and all public transport will be suspended for at least 48 hours. The temporary ban on public transport will remain in place until the end of the month. Those who need to enter the territory will have to self-isolate for two weeks, or follow the same guidelines as in the Northern Territory. The Territory's chief health officer Dr Kerry Chant said the ban on public transport was designed to make sure all people travelling on public transport were well and that they were not infected. The restrictions come as public health officials said another person was suspected to have the virus in the Northern Territory and the Victorian man who recently travelled to the Northern Territory had been quarantined. NT Chief Health Officer Kerry Chant said it was too early to tell if there was an outbreak in the Territory. "We're monitoring movements on a daily basis," Dr Chant said. "There is a case in the Northern Territory and there has been a travel link." She also said a person was quarantined after having been in contact with the person suspected of having the virus in the Northern Territory. Restrictions in place 'to minimise virus spread' The state of emergency, which was declared on Wednesday, is in place for at least 72 hours and allows the Territory's Chief Minister Michael Gunner to "make orders for the better prevention of or for the suppression or control of any disturbances, emergencies or dangers". "This includes the use of troops and other law enforcement agencies for the purpose of restraining or controlling persons," the state of emergency declaration says. "It also includes the use of traffic routes in or around Darwin for the purpose of discharging any motor vehicle used by troops, police or emergency services in or around Darwin." Mr
