A: The error is because when you call `response.body()` it tries to call `length()` on the body, which is a buffer, not a string. If you want to get the length, use `response.body().length()`. You can also use `response.getContentLength()` to get the length of the body, but this method is deprecated in favor of `response.getHeader('Content-Length')`. [Visualization of cell walls of yeasts (Saccharomyces cerevisiae) as a function of their culture conditions]. SEM observations on the cell walls of five strains of Saccharomyces cerevisiae (brewer's yeast, wine yeast and two industrial strains) and one strain of Saccharomyces bayanus have been carried out. Extracellular and intracellular changes on the cell walls have been studied in S. cerevisiae mutants defective in maltose-producing activities and in alpha-glucosidase activity. The influences of the medium composition and incubation temperature on the production of glycogen and on the composition of the wall were studied. Two parameters, namely the amount of phosphomannan involved in the cell wall and its compactness have been precisely quantified. Their values are closely related to the cell size and to the growth rate of the cell. In the same way, some modifications have been observed in the cellular distribution of phosphomannan: this compound undergoes an accumulation in the nucleus and a cytoplasmic degradation in the high-pH microenvironment of endosomes.

Q: How to run two separate Express routes with one function? I want to run two separate Express routes (one for a JSON API and one for a React app) both with one function. I have a function that looks like this `const isLoggedIn = (next) => { if (localStorage.authToken) { return next(); } axios.interceptors.response.use((response) => { localStorage.setItem('auth', response.data.id) return response; }); };` App.jsx import React, { Component } from 'react'; import { BrowserRouter, Route, Switch } from 'react-router-dom'; import Login from '
