The risk of thyroid cancer in relation to different subtypes of autoimmune thyroid disease, including Graves' disease and hyperthyroidism, remains unclear. We examined thyroid cancer risks among patients with autoimmune thyropathies by reviewing thyroid cancer rates, completeness of cancer data and numbers of years at risk among patients with Graves' disease, compared with patients with hyperthyroidism, including toxic multinodular goitre and thyroid-stimulating hormone (TSH) excess. Cancer incidence risk estimates in the UK, based on the Birmingham/Edinburgh/Glasgow study, were applied to other studies. For each syndrome, we reviewed UK cancer registry data to determine completeness of cancer identification, and assumed a continuous risk of thyroid cancer throughout the years of patient follow-up. The estimated number of years of follow-up was obtained by using the method of Wilson and colleagues. In the UK, the corrected prevalence of autoimmune thyropathies exceeds that of hyperthyroidism. For Graves' disease, without any sex bias, age-adjusted incidence rates are rising from 2.8 to 10.7/10(5) with an estimated risk increase of 4.9/10(5). Women bear a threefold excess risk, increasing with age. For hyperthyroidism, without any sex bias, age-adjusted incidence rates are also rising from 1.9 to 5.3/10(5), with an estimated risk increase of 3.4/10(5). Women bear a 1.8-fold excess risk. The majority of cases of thyroid cancer are intrathyroidal and are usually diagnosed with other autoimmune conditions. Completeness of cancer identification in the UK is high and population-based rates appear reliable. The UK rates of thyroid cancer in patients with autoimmune thyropathies exceed those seen in patients with hyperthyroidism or Graves' disease. Cancer rates for patients with Graves' disease
