We explore this concept in more depth in this article. With 85 percent of construction industry workers employed on the jobsite, the need to manage site costs and projects is critical for clients. In addition to the significant opportunity costs associated with being unable to meet construction deadlines, contractors are also exposed to potential liability in the event of health, safety or environmental problems. The growing percentage of mobile workers in our industry has made it possible for clients to quickly relocate to an alternative site. When a project crosses borders or shifts to a new location that is more than several hours away, this option becomes a necessity. The idea that the contractor is the employee's first point of contact who has the knowledge and resources to address many of their needs is ever-changing. Increasingly, the client is looking to the contractor to handle logistics (such as transportation, relocation, supplies, etc.) and long-distance problems. Instead of running between multiple locations, the workforce can be "clicked" to a new location using options such as telecommuting, travel management, mobile app technology and continuing care True mobility The industry has changed with today's workers, who increasingly choose to work from home, and telecommute or log in remotely. Many employers have installed sophisticated cloud-based IT systems that allow workers to log on from home. Although cloud IT systems have the ability to facilitate remote work, those solutions are often not flexible enough to handle long-distance problems. They may not be able to protect a company's data, optimize a mobile workforce or make it easy to manage complex sites across multiple locations. In the past, when a remote worker experienced an urgent problem, they had to either travel back to the job site or find someone who knew the problem well enough to bring to the job site to fix it. The mobile workforce can significantly reduce the need for long-distance travel. Companies that are in a position to do so should leverage the mobility of their staff. 595f342e71
