I am a student who will be running a project for his class on the topic of SEO. I will have a couple of thousand papers on the topic, and I am planning on "gaming" the search engines by posting both good and bad information/papers on the topic. If I do not mention the correct papers (or even worse, Google can pull up the results before the assigned deadline) the class will fail and I will have to redo my project (and pay for that service). This being said, can Stackexchange do anything about this? A: It's a bit of a gray area, but Stack Overflow is friendly to new users and so shouldn't decline your question. There have been occasional concerns over content density, but I don't think it has really hurt the site. The best option is probably to ask on a Meta site. They are more willing to take somewhat unprofessional questions and they can also sometimes be more willing to help new users. If you can find a Meta site that is relevant for the class that you are doing, then post the question there. (Perhaps ask on Workplace or meta.SE?) Even if a question here is considered a duplicate of an existing question, it is usually advisable to include the existing question in a comment. The Waves L3 Multimaximizer, the worlds first auto-summing multi-band limiter for all-in-one mastering is a plugin worth trying out. But is it that good that it should be my main tool to get my mastering to the next level? L3 is definitely not for everyone. Its too complex for beginners. Luckily, Waves support ist the best in the business: A lot of information can be found on their support pages. Ive worked a bit with the L3 myself, and especially like the multi setting which takes the value of every band. One suggestion would be to have the user be able to mix the bands (automatically or manually) first, to check what kind of master audio will be created. A nice feature iÂ . L3 Multi Maximizer is the worlds first auto-summing multi-band limiter for all-in-one mastering The only way to turn the L3 into a peak limiter is to set the trigger threshold to zero. Mixer Absolutely top quality. The L3 releases a very narrow frequency response with a comfortable peak level for 20 band on both sides from 16 to 12 KHz. I have used it for years as it tracks the sum total of human hearing and will cut off the top without a problem. The only limitation is it can "only" do 4+ bands. (I have an HP2810). The "traditional" way to do it is to master one, then sum all bands. That's because the L3 only allows you to set the middle bands. At L3 you can set every band to your likings one by one or set the maximum value and let it automatically sum all the bands. You can go crazy with this tool, cutting too much or clipping, but the L3 will limit the peak to the front of the room. And it does it fast. When I started working with the L3, I had a big fear of a too high number of bands. For the first time I heard that multi band was possible. I heard somebody talking that
