Q: Why does readline on Linux close stdin when reading a file? I have a shell script that works fine on Windows. In order to get it to work on Linux, I've had to add the following line: `#!/bin/sh -vx if ["$1" = "--no-up"]; then set -x exec "$0" "$@" elif ["$1" = "--up"]; then exec "$0" "$@" fi` I found this solution here on SO: How to call external program with specific options in Bash script Apparently the `-vx` is supposed to be equivalent to `set -x`. I can't see why it would make a difference whether we're running the script as `./scriptname` or using `sh scriptname`. Any ideas on why running this script on Linux would make the readline library close stdin? Is there some equivalent of `set -x` that needs to be added when executing via `sh scriptname`? A: It seems that the readline library in Linux read stdin with a special function. I haven't found a way to make readline ignore

Although lately that has not been the case and lately it's been the opposite. They make lots of bad movies and it's getting worse! 20th Century Fox recently released their new Resident Evil film, which you can check out the trailer for here. It looks like it's going to be a fun movie, so I won't be sad to see it be a success. However, I was reading a very interesting article in The Verge about who should direct the live-action Star Wars films going into production. I'm a huge Star Wars fan, so this really caught my eye. We are at a turning point in the movie industry, where movies are now getting made all over the world, and studios are realizing that they can get a bigger profit margin if they put a movie into production in the first place. This makes good business sense, especially if you're a big Hollywood studio. However, this also makes it harder for talented directors to be hired. Without further ado, here is who I believe should direct the next Star Wars films. Adam Driver -- Okay, this was actually a really tough call because all of these choices are very good choices. However, in a world where all actors and directors are always being attached to projects, it's hard to say "this actor can't do that". When it comes to Star Wars, it's really a case of "who is most qualified to direct and write the script? I always love Adam Driver in roles that he would never get because he's too good looking. " Adam Driver-- He's in the exact same boat as Adam above. He's really good and the last thing we need is a X-Men type movie for Star Wars. Here's the perfect role for him though, he would be perfect as a villain
