The atmospheric concentration of radon in the indoor environment is affected by various factors, especially by factors related to the geologic structure of the basement. Porous rock formations in which radon diffuses easily are considered as a major radon source. The implementation of loose-fill vitrification for sanitization purposes and storage of spent nuclear fuel may lead to an increase of rock porosity, which in turn may trigger a reduction in radon concentration in the space. In the following paper the results of a radon monitoring experiment in a building located in the vicinity of a nuclear power plant in the Czech Republic are presented. A tight-sealed concrete block with a glass plate was used as a reference system. Apart from this, a loose-fill vitrified panel (SF), as a potential radon sink, was compared with a loose-fill vitrified panel with a steel plate (SFSP). Two radon monitors were installed in the building in order to obtain a monthly series of data for each of the above-mentioned systems. The experiment shows significant radon concentration decline in the basements located under the loose-fill vitrified panel. This is a result of the reduced gas-pore space in the rock under the loose-fill vitrified panel. A reduction in gas-pore space not only reduces radon diffusivity, but also causes a decrease of air volume in the pores, which in turn influences the convective flow inside the porous rock body.Q: JUnit to test the amount of elements in an array I am testing a method in class BookSalesApplication as below: @Test public void testValidAmountOfBooks() { List b1 = new ArrayList(Arrays.asList(

It's a perfect example of how simple algebra and trigonometry can be combined to solve a quadratic equation. It's also a good example of how someone can use his or her first experiences in mathematics and algebra to find the solution to a very simple equation without even knowing that the quadratic formula exists. Functions is the story of Tristan Jones. Tristan is your typical 11th grader, except for his hobbies. He spends most of his time with his friends, playing sports and fixing his bike when it breaks. But one day his mom mysteriously disappears, and he ends up getting tangled up in some weird science experiments. Eventually, Tristan finds a way to make contact with his mom using some unknown science and gets to have a glimpse into the future. Sooner or later, Tristan has to return to the past, and it's up to him to follow the rules of physics that he knows, to figure out how to get home. So, in the end, Tristan has to make some pretty tough decisions to return home to the present. Will he save his mom and bring his friends to the future, or will he let them go and save the future? In the end, Tristan discovers that his math is just a part of the overall physics of his universe. It's a fun story, told in a fun
