Blockade of endothelin ETB receptors in the absence of vasoconstriction induces cyclooxygenase-1-dependent edema formation in rat dorsal skin. The vasodilatory peptide endothelin-1 (ET-1) is a potent stimulator of cutaneous edema formation which can be blocked by ETB receptor antagonists. Although the ETB receptor is expressed on vascular endothelial cells, we have recently provided evidence that ETB receptor blockade also abolishes cutaneous edema formation which is not accompanied by vascular smooth muscle cell contraction. Since the peptide endothelin-2 (ET-2) lacks vasoactive activity, and ET-2 has been shown to contract vascular smooth muscle cells, we examined whether ET-2 might also induce cyclooxygenase-1-dependent edema formation after topical application to rat skin. ET-2 induced edema formation in a dose-dependent manner, and after 50 min of application, the formation of capillary filaments in the rat skin dorsal skin was 60 +/- 6% of control values. The ETB receptor antagonist BQ788 reduced the ET-2-induced edema formation by 50% with significant inhibition of the increased lymphatic clearance which accompanies ET-2-induced edema. Surprisingly, ET-2 also induced significant edema formation in the absence of vascular smooth muscle cell contraction and in the absence of increased lymphatic clearance (only 9 +/- 3% of control values). Pretreatment of the skin with the cyclooxygenase-1 inhibitor celecoxib (10 mg/kg) reduced the ET-2-induced edema formation by 57% but had no effect on the ET-2-induced edema in the absence of vascular smooth muscle cell contraction. These results demonstrate that ET-2 is an extremely potent stimulator of cyclooxygenase-1-dependent edema formation in rat skin and that its vasodilatory activity has little relevance to cutaneous edema formation.
