

.Wellbore integrity tool A wellbore integrity tool (WIT) is an instrument that is intended to monitor the integrity of a wellbore during drilling, completion, and operation. The monitor uses information transmitted from the wellbore, such as pressure, temperature, and time, to determine if a problem has occurred. WITs perform different functions. Fiber optic cables and pressure sensors allow information to be transmitted to the surface in real-time. A resistivity-logging tool provides information about the characteristics of the formation. A drill-stem test provides information on the hydrostatic pressures. Other types of WITs can be designed to perform specialized functions. WITs are widely used in well operations. Because of the intrinsic wellbore damage that occurs during some well operations, such as frac, water entry, perforation, or wellbore clean out, it is sometimes necessary to test the integrity of the wellbore with the WIT to ensure that the well is safe to drill out. Many WITs are designed to be temporarily installed as a wireline tool and can be retrieved when the well is deemed to be safe. These devices are typically made of plastic, steel, and or composite materials. They named their company after a prime Maine river port on the Penobscot, the riverside city once famous for its shipbuilding. The name, Central Maine, was intended to reflect the importance of the company's port in Bangor, and to underscore the fact that the company would provide shipping services and other goods to the entire region, including long-distance shipping from the upper and lower Penobscot Rivers. The company would go on to be known for decades as one of the region's most dynamic and innovative businesses. But the company's roots were in the days when Bangor was called the ports and trading center of the West, when the Penobscot marked the edge of the Old World, and when the river wasn't just a major source of freight, but a means to transport goods and people through the region. MINNEAPOLIS – A defiant Ryan Leaf showed no contrition during a jailhouse interview with ESPN’s “Outside the Lines” that appears in its entirety Thursday morning. Leaf, a receiver who once helped Colorado to the 1998 BCS title, was sentenced in 2001 to probation for failing to submit to a drug test and was arrested in Washington in April of last year after a dispute with police. Leaf also has a pending misdemeanor trial on assault charges in Los Angeles. The ESPN interview with Leaf, which runs about 40 minutes, was conducted in shackles and lasted more than two hours at the Washington County Detention Center in St. Paul, Minn. Leaf spoke to the “Outside the Lines” crew for nearly five hours. During the interview, Leaf called the allegations against him for attempting to steal prescription drugs from a store “insulting.” He also said he wasn’t supposed to be in Washington, because it’s the state of California. Leaf also argues that he’s a victim of big-money players in the NFL, and he maintains that he didn’t steal anything from the store and was only trying to buy drugs. “I don’t respect the NFL. I don’t respect the NFLPA. I don’t respect the owners. I don’t respect anybody,” Leaf said during the interview. “They didn’t even allow me to have access to my own benefits fund. Why would I do that? I don’t even like the NFL.” Leaf, 29, wants his name cleared so he can play in the NFL. Leaf has been a coach in the XFL. He wants to play football for Minnesota, which he said he made a visit to in June. “I want to play football. I love football,” Leaf said in the interview. His attorney in Washington, Andrew Sekel, said Leaf’s case has been “hijacked by these charges.” Sekel says the case in California Occ13bf012
