Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a liquid crystal display device, and more particularly, to an array substrate for a liquid crystal display device having a wide viewing angle and a high aperture ratio and a method for fabricating the array substrate. 2. Discussion of the Related Art A liquid crystal display device is a widely used flat panel display because of its high contrast ratio, characteristics suitable for displaying moving images, and low power consumption. An active matrix liquid crystal display (AMLCD) includes a plurality of thin film transistors and pixel electrodes arranged in a matrix pattern in each pixel. A thin film transistor (TFT) is used as a switching element. A voltage supplied to the pixel electrodes drives the liquid crystal layer, and a color image is displayed by controlling the light transmission and reflection of the liquid crystal layer. Methods of aligning liquid crystal molecules include a method of forming an alignment film for aligning a liquid crystal cell, a method of directly rubbing a substrate by a rubbing cloth and a method of rubbing a liquid crystal cell with a rubbing agent. Liquid crystal displays have been employed in various applications and are now incorporated in various articles such as a small portable television, a mobile phone, a digital camera and an automatic teller machine (ATM). The liquid crystal display device includes an active matrix liquid crystal display (AMLCD) having a thin film transistor array substrate and a color filter array substrate bonded to each other, and a liquid crystal layer disposed between the thin film transistor array substrate and the color filter array substrate. A thin film transistor (TFT) is formed at each pixel, and an image signal applied through the TFT is supplied to a pixel electrode of the thin film transistor array substrate or a color filter substrate. However, the liquid crystal display device has a narrow viewing angle. Various modifications have been proposed to modify the viewing angle of the liquid crystal display device. However, there are certain limitations in the narrow viewing angle

What's new in The Mountain Hunting:

: The Challenger Team: Does It Matter? As the Houston Automotive Media Association (HAMA) unveiled its annual awards last week, the impression of rowdiness came and went like a building wild-card fever dream. The sociability of the crew was one of the things that made the more “social” events unique. But “sociability,” in and of itself, cannot be seen as a marker of quality. In a very real sense, social characters like Tim Skubain, Neil Ward, and Brooke Bailey, who have consistently worked and created together from the beginning of the sport’s history, should be the indicators of quality. Similarly, their contemporaries (including Matt Biren and Ryan Eversley) can equally be said to be motoring friends, each pursuing a different goal with the passion and dedication that they have always shown, no matter their relative success. But that sort of thing only happens in the rare construct of a childhood that may have influenced the sort of passion these people show, or even the small aëroplane that several of them, collectively representing Challenger Racing, each holds at the heart of their personal success story. “The origin” is the kind of thing you read about in an auto magazine, a small feature in a chronicle of the sport’s history. Chrysler’s decision to bring a dedicated aëroplane team to the 2009 24 Hours of Le Mans heralded, for some, the end of the racing sports car, but for some others, it marked the rebirth of a much-needed challenge in its plans to regain the market. Challenger, Eversley, and CGR made their first Le Mans “seriously” in September 2004. They then made a successful pass in 2006. Last year, they failed to qualify. In 2008, they had less luck, cracking the 7-hour barrier with Riley but not qualifying. This year, Challenger is back and even has snuck out for one more pass, making it clear that they’re “doing well.” But what is that doing for the future? With the new team, is this just a new version of a product that the GTX might have become from the start, having nothing to say that is new or especially compelling, by numbers or by quality? Or is this a new, clean, ultra-competitive breeding ground for cars that will make all the Challenger's American counterparts a little less
