Land surface changes wrought by humans are considered one of the main causes of biodiversity loss worldwide, but the impact of natural disturbances is usually neglected. Here we provide evidence that a natural fire burned in north-eastern Brazil, which has never been subjected to this kind of anthropic intervention, has produced long-term changes in ecosystem properties, where tree species composition was drastically modified. This was due to the high mortality of temperate trees by fire and to a recovery of forest structure and species composition after rain fall. We show that the resulting ecosystem structure and composition are comparable to those of pre-European forests in the same region, characterized by a dense tree layer and a low biomass. We further show that fire favors the persistence of the regenerating temperate tree species that are widely preferred by wildlife, since this species are able to withstand the disturbances produced by fire without affecting their recruitment. In addition, we identify two implications of this fire for conservation: the role that fire can play as a disturbance that promotes the recovery of forest ecosystems and its potential use as a tool to regulate forest structure and composition. To live in violation of the law, we sanction his actions and call on the President to order North Korea to end its defiance of global norms and take concrete steps to allow the U.N. to more swiftly implement its latest sanctions." An earlier statement from the ministry had also slammed North Korea's nuclear program. "As the results of our repeated demands, the DPRK has turned to development of nuclear weapons, claiming that the development is necessary to cope with the sanctions," the statement said. "It seems that the DPRK has chosen to take a road to economic destruction and a collapse of its social system." Washington doesn't know whether he may have nuclear weapons, and has been concentrating on finding more evidence about his movements, South Korea's spy agency said. It said North Korea had provided the United States intelligence, including how his wife and son were treated while
