Structure of the mucin of human intestinal mucus. Human intestinal mucus was examined in the light of its core structure and its relationship to known molecular structures of mucins and other glycoproteins. Mucus was collected from segments of ileal and colonic mucosa from 4 adults who had provided samples in the course of a previous investigation. Mucus gel was extracted with 0.4 M KCl and the remaining mucous gel was assayed for glycoprotein, electrolyte, and water content. The mucous gel had a specific weight of approximately 300 mg/g (3.3 mg/m²), equivalent to a molecular weight of 4×10^6 . The glycoprotein fraction had a specific weight of approximately 300 mg/g (3.3 mg/m²) and was greater in colonic mucus than in ileal mucus. Electron micrographs showed that mucus was not a single phase but consisted of particles of approximately 1.0 micron in diameter. The carbohydrate content was found to be approximately 60% of the weight of the mucous gel. Acyl-glycosyl-hydroxy amino acids were separated from the glycoprotein fraction and were identified. These structures were glycosyl-hydroxy amino acids linked through oxygen to glucosamine at the C-6 of the arabinose residue of a proline or 4-hydroxyphenyl residue. Threonine was the most predominant amino acid followed by serine. Forty percent of the acyl glycosides were in the form of fucosyl derivatives.

There was little difference between the ileal and colonic mucus. The molecular weight of the fraction of the mucous gel assayed for mucin and the crystalline/colloidal state of the glycoprotein fraction indicated that the mucous gel was more like a mucin than a mucop
