Uncovering and explaining how our digital world is changing — and changing us. This story is part of a group of stories called There's a lot of buzz around blockchain technology — the technology that underpins bitcoin and other cryptocurrencies. And while it brings security benefits for certain industries, there is also a degree of skepticism from lawmakers about how companies can use it. One of the most memorable complaints from the public has come from Santander — the financial services company that recently announced a move to incorporate blockchain technology. Jamie Dimon, CEO of JPMorgan Chase (JPM), has leveled calls for consumers and business competitors to be wary of the blockchain technology and banks to avoid misusing it. In prepared remarks, Dimon said: "Cryptocurrency has taken down a lot of bank customer accounts. Russians are buying bitcoin in ATMs. The secretaries of state can use it to secure their e-mails. There are use cases like these for blockchain, but none for banks. Blockchain is being used to enhance security but also to cut costs. Banks have to be careful about using blockchain to create settlement risk." Dimon at Davos Dimon's comments, which came in the wake of Bank of England governor Mark Carney predicting that using blockchain could be a key component of a future payment system run by central banks, come as banks and blockchain technology giants prepare for the G-20 Summit in California next week. The summit will put pressure on regulators to adopt a new set of standards for the overall cryptocurrency industry, and blockchain technology in particular. Dimon's comments came as a panel at the World Economic Forum's annual event discussed how to regulate the nascent technology in a way that doesn't harm businesses' ability to innovate. At the Davos summit next week, Alibaba — the e-commerce giant, and onetime leader of the global blockchain trade group — will announce more

Reduction of the nitrocellulose filter paper support with respect to extraction and quantification of the tumor markers. Reduction of the nitrocellulose filter paper support (NPP) with respect to the extraction of the tumor markers alpha-fetoprotein (AFP) and carcinoembryonic antigen (CEA) is introduced. For this purpose the attachment of several NPP was simulated by labelling NPP with radioactive markers and weighing. The weights of the NPP with different amounts of radioactive material were measured. By taking out the exact masses of the NPP a point of interest was found where, for a given marker, the weight of the NPP was not influenced by further attachment of radioactive markers. By using the last NPP attached with the mass of 100 mCi [3.7×10^{-7} mol (100 mg filter paper = 8.8×10^7 particles)], the weight of the modified NPP was kept constant. The mass of the radioactive marker was taken out from the first NPP and the weight of the modified NPP was measured again. The weight loss of the NPP was assigned to the marker. The efficiency of this method was proven by recovering the marker from the NPP, which is described. In addition, the method is simple and easy to handle.
