[@bib20] and most important, we obtain (this study) a thorough qualitative comparison of the potential of MSCs in the treatment of sepsis in an established murine model of peritonitis-induced sepsis. In addition to this, we can show that MSCs but also adjunctive treatment with antibiotics led to a significant survival benefit. Combining the results of this study with the previously described beneficial effects of MSCs on infectious and on non-infectious stress (reviewed in [@bib30]), we suggest that MSC therapy has a profound effect on the complex pathophysiology of sepsis. Furthermore, we think that this may represent a new approach in the treatment of sepsis. The possible beneficial effects of MSCs on the inflammatory component of sepsis have already been reported several times. However, it is still difficult to draw clear conclusions from these previous studies since the type of sepsis model used and the MSC treatment methods differed from this study. Some studies, for example, treated animals with repetitive intraperitoneal injections of MSCs during the course of infection [@bib31], [@bib32], while others injected MSCs into animals at the beginning of infection [@bib33]. In a previous study, we observed a significant increase in plasma IL-10 levels in a murine model of abdominal sepsis compared to sham-operated animals, without a reduction of the systemic IL-6 levels. We now use a model of peritonitis-induced sepsis in which we administered a single intraperitoneal injection of cecal ligation and puncture to mimic infection in humans [@bib34]. We added also a group of animals that received a systemic, intraperitoneal treatment of MSCs directly into the peritoneal cavity, in order to compare the MSC-mediated effects to the effects of direct and intravenous treatment of animals with MSCs. Indeed, a single intraperitoneal injection of MSCs has been shown to be as efficient as a three-day continuous intravenous infusion [@bib35]. Our results show that a single intraperitoneal injection of MSCs has beneficial effects on the systemic cytokine profile in an established murine model of peritonitis-induced sepsis. The highest increase in IL-10 plasma concentrations after MSC treatment was observed in animals that received only MSC
