Still the question, what is the best free or notepad replacement that has the following features: has color syntax highlighting, auto indentation, and reformatting? A: PyCharm Professional Edition or IntelliJ IDEA Ultimate license key can be found on their websites. But they are not free software. If you want to use the features as you mentioned, you need to buy them. Q: How can I move my setup & teardown code out of class tests? I am trying to write tests which access a database and so need to create a connection to the database in the setUp method and close the connection in the tearDown method. This works fine if the tests are in the same test class. However, if they are in a different test class I need to move both the setUp and tearDown methods out of the class and invoke them from the constructor method of the class. This sounds like a terrible idea as if I change the setup() method the underlying database connection may now be wrong. I am using Maven and the junit-maven-plugin to run the tests and the idea was that when I moved the setup & teardown out of the class, then the information about the current database connection (and possibly the schema) was carried over into the classes that use it. Is this a really bad idea, or have I misunderstood the design of unit testing? A: It makes a lot of sense to separate the setup and teardown logic into test setup and tearDown methods. The purpose of unit tests is to test small pieces of your code. There is no point in putting database connection logic in the setup and teardown. The simplest way to do this is to define a setup function and a teardown function in a test setup and teardown class. To use this setup and teardown class in multiple tests, make the methods static or nested classes. For example: public class DatabaseSetup { public static void setup() { // Make a connection to the database } public static void tearDown() { // Close the connection } } public class MyTest1 extends TestCase { public void test1() { setup(); // do some stuff } public void test2() {
