I've been working for 2 years in a project where we are using Subversion (svn). I have never done any version control, because our team does not allow anyone to be the custodian of our code (I'm a contractor). My company insists that we use a centralized VCS (we can have a github account, but not push directly to github). I tried to get the other team members use git with github, but it seems to be almost impossible to get everyone on board. I'm in a team of 10 with roughly 4 coders working at a time, most of them new to python. These newbies would prefer to use git, but the senior developers are already set on svn. My questions: Am I right to have the concern that if nobody is really pushing the project, it would be a lot of work and no gain for everyone? If that's the case, how can I convince my coworkers to use git? Is there any best-practice I can follow? Thanks! Edit: My team use github as a repository, all the commits and pushes are made through github.
