My talk - Keep your smartphone but don't get too attached to it - is in the same arena as new research done by Cambridge University into the psychological impact of technology on us. One of the findings of their study is that to be safe we have to stay connected - yet doing so means becoming attached and dependency on technology becomes a worry. Technology won't work without you. I am the first to admit I have to ask for help and I rely on a combination of technology and people to get through the day, to communicate and be social. In a fast-moving world, new technology can be a force for good, keeping us connected, learning and helping us find new solutions to the challenges we face. But technology is not benign; it can also have a psychological and even physical impact on how we interact. The scientists found people who used technology the most had the most emotional problems. Technology causes stress because it can be addictive. Twitter We've been talking a lot about the Twitter worm in which over 200,000 laptops were wiped. At the time I was worried about the security implications for the people behind the social network. Although I wasn't involved in the development of
